What is a

Cambridge International School?

A Cambridge International School is a school recognized worldwide by Cambridge International Education, part of the University of Cambridge.

This means that the school adopts international educational standards, uses official Cambridge programmes, and is part of a global network of over 10,000 schools in 160 countries.

Being a Cambridge school means offering students a modern and well-rounded education that combines strong academic knowledge, personal skills, and a global outlook.

A pathway designed to nurture curious, confident, and future-ready learners.

we don't study English,

we learn in English.

Primary school is a time when curiosity grows into knowledge and children discover the joy of learning. At the Keynes Institute, we listen closely to each child and give them the support they need to recognise their strengths, become more independent and take on new challenges with confidence.

As children develop their skills in languages, mathematics, science and creative expression, they also learn to observe closely, ask questions and find solutions.

Children learn by taking part. They explore problems, compare ideas, experiment and share what they discover.

Children learn to connect what they study in class with the world around them. These connections give meaning to what they learn and help them develop their own ways of working more independently, day by day.

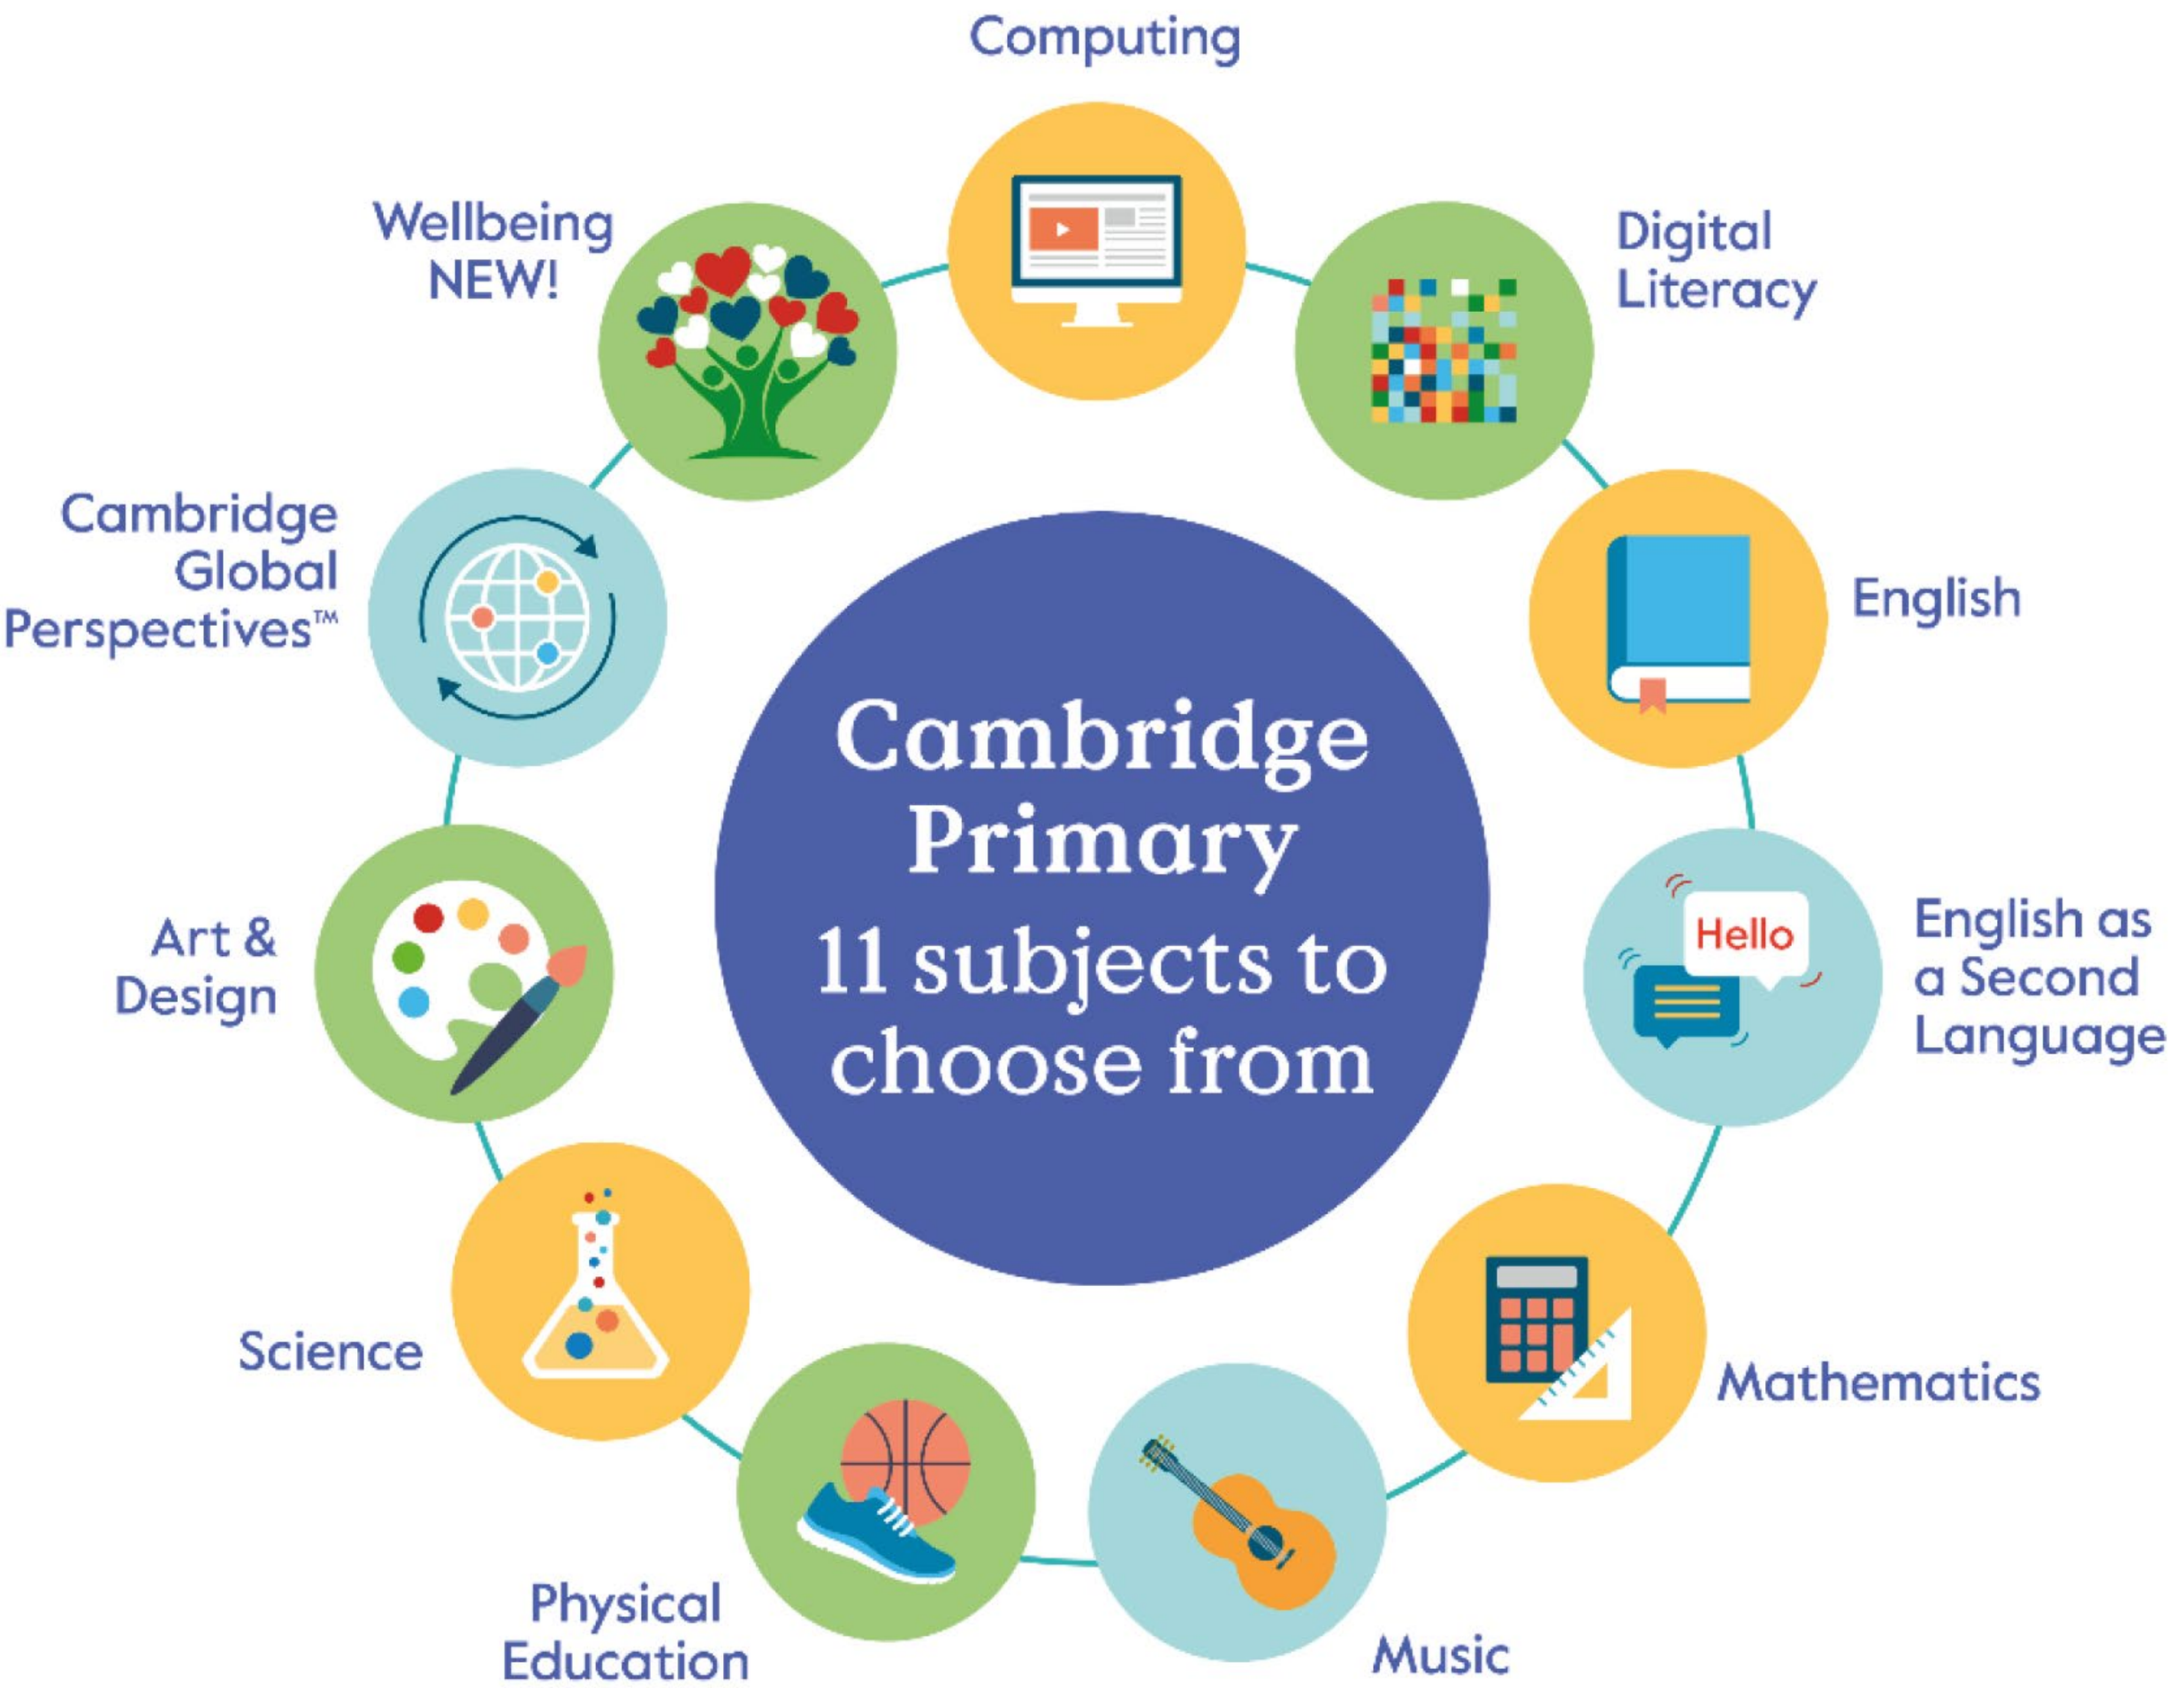

Teachers guide each child at their own pace and recognise the progress they make. Mistakes give children a chance to understand what happened, try again and discover new possibilities.

Learning to think, opening up to the world

The programme encourages children to see the world from a global perspective. They come to understand that knowledge lies as much in how they think as in what they learn.

Cambridge Primary is built around ten core subjects designed to develop a strong academic foundation and skills children can apply across subjects and beyond the classroom:

The large pine forest, sports fields, and outdoor areas offer daily opportunities for outdoor activities, artistic experiences, and physical movement, making the school a lively and open environment.

For students attending the afternoon programme, the school offers dance, theatre, musical instrument courses, and a choice of sports including football, judo, artistic gymnastics, basketball, and tennis, ensuring a balanced education.

Cambridge Learner Attributes

Students at the Keynes Institute learn to navigate the complexity of the world with balance and critical thinking, combining cognitive abilities, social skills, and personal qualities such as resilience, motivation, and self-awareness.
